Hello World

This is another page that has 800 chars.

At midnight, the lighthouse began blinking in Morse code.

Mara had lived on the island for forty years and knew every rhythm of its ancient lamp. This was different. Three short flashes, three long, three short. SOS.

She climbed the spiral staircase, expecting a broken mechanism. Instead, she found a dusty radio humming beside a photograph of her father, who had vanished at sea when she was seven.

The radio crackled.

“Mara,” whispered a familiar voice. “If you can hear me, don't open the door.”

Behind her, the lighthouse door handle slowly turned.

She froze. Her father had been missing for thirty-three years.

Another whisper came through the radio.

“I'm outside.”

Mara looked through the window. Far below, a small boat rocked against the rocks. An old man stood beside it, smiling up at her.

Then the radio screamed.

“Whatever you do,” her father's voice begged, “don't let me in.”

This is page 3